“Building relationships with patients and learning about their lives.”

About Erin Harrington, MSN, FNP

Erin Harrington was inspired to pursue a career in the medical field by her sisters, who all work in healthcare. “Healthcare specifically became my focus after college when I was a Peace Corps volunteer in Paraguay, where I saw what it was like for people to live without access to care,” she explains. She actively listens to her patients to learn what is important to them. “Building relationships with patients and learning about their lives” is her favorite part of her profession.

In her free time, Erin Harrington can be found biking, reading, or going to her daughter’s soccer games and swim meets. She is also a foster parent and says she misses the mountains in Denver, where she lived for ten years.
